

The folks from Movie Web recently caught up with the director of next week's Captain America: The First Avenger movie, Joe Johnston, where he weighed in on the character's portrayal in next year's The Avengers; and potential Captain America sequels. "Chris Evans plays a slightly different character in The Avengers. Which I think is good. I think he should be a different character, because he is in a different world. He is still Steve Rogers, and he retains those traits that make him the guy we all call Captain America, but at the same time, he should be different. Now? He is a man out of time. It should affect him. I really don't know anything about The Avengers, and I chose not to get involved in it. I haven't read the script, I haven't seen any footage. Because I didn't want it to influence me. I didn't want to think, "That
